C. RESEARCH AND POLICY FORMULATION EXPERIENCE

- Coordinator of the Program in Religion, Conflict and Peacebuilding (PRCP)
(July 2001 – June 2006)

This interdisciplinary, inter-religious program explores the complex roles of diverse Religious traditions in contemporary conflicts. The PRCP encompasses the full spectrum of religious involvement in contemporary conflict, from the religious legitimization of violence to religious peacebuilding efforts, such as mediation by religious groups and efforts to promote inter-religious and intra-religious dialogue. Research focuses on the phenomenon of "lived religion" by examining how religious leaders and movements "translate" sacred scriptures and traditional norms into practical principles that shape decisions and behaviors "on the ground." Through deeper understanding of religion's complex role in conflict situations, the Program hopes to strengthen the potential for peacebuilding within all religious traditions.

- Coordinator of The Research Initiative in Ethnic Conflict (RIREC)
(July 2001 – June 2004)

RIREC is a new project of the Kroc Institute focusing on post-accord peacebuilding and the difficult but pressing questions of how to create a sustainable, just peace after a period of protracted conflict. The project develops an interdisciplinary team of scholars and practitioners working around three research themes - violence, youth/the next generation, and transitional justice. At the heart of the project is an effort to develop new theoretical lenses for comprehending the nuances of post- accord peacebuilding, which will integrate conflict management and conflict transformation concerns, techniques and methodologies. The project will test these lenses against cases and develop relevant policy recommendations.

One of its two projects, the Religion and Public Education Project, has produced a widely distributed report on policy options, a teacher-training manual, and textbooks, and has conducted pilot projects in local schools and teacher-training colleges to develop new programs and materials for religion education. In addition to academic and action research, ICRSA sponsors public lectures, regular seminars, community workshops, and occasional publications.
